A GIFT FOR

Prince
Benny

This would give his life meaning — the perfect gift from father to son. But what of his daughter and the hunger deep in her heart? What heritage could there be for her?

ILLUSTRATED BY E. W. BICKMAN

By IRVIN BLOCK

DEERLY from sleep Molly heard a sound as new as felt her father come into the room. She hugged her pillow and waited for sleep but consciousness rolled over her anyway, an outside note, the black night round away and she lay back and dry and awake at last listening to the grating footsteps as he walked around the room. "I won't get up today, she told herself once as she told herself every morning. I won't get up and if they make me get up I will not go to the store. I will not sell dairy. I will not just walk in. I will not show them, shame and shame on them. Surely! Today I will go to the library and there get books, chemistry papers or novels."

Mr. Miller's proud face the next in an agony of care and stood at the side of his daughter's bed. Seeing the book often opened upon the floor, he stooped to pick it up, examining slightly and read as the "John Chamberlain." He shook his head and went anxiously to the hallway to get his hand on Molly's shoulder. "The little girl's eyes cracked suddenly behind their spectacles. But his voice was soft. "Molly, get up! It's time to get up!"

"So it's time to get up," and Molly with her eyes still shut, "She's late. She's late every day, get up to sleep till night!"

"Come on," said Mr. Miller, "no monkey business."

"Go on back to sleep, Pa. Do you want? What I want—daddy come to bed. Sleep with me!"

"We need the library books. Come to me, get up today, get up for her into the pillow. "Fifty cents."

Mr. Miller sat on Molly's bed and studied the cover of the book still in his hand. "Open your eyes at last, Molly. I gotta talk to you."

"All right, Pa, what's in your mind?"

"Pa thought his heart toward the real world. "Fifty cents."

"The bed was not till three last night."

Molly jumped toward up on her elbow and, peeping out her blanket, knew sharply and shook the last moments of sleep. "Do what?" she said.

"Look, why don't you stop talking like this? It's like to me a house or something?" She's eighteen years old and he read the book and he knows the answer and the question and he's not then and so won't think. It's between mother and he's got a right to have some fun. How let the bed sleep?"

"But Molly—there of sleep in the morning?"

"It's written in the Bible you get to get to bed before then!"

"It's no time for a young university student in to coming home!" and Mr. Miller's sternly. "I'll be with you with that girl that looks."

"That's a hell!"

Mr. Miller turned and glared at Molly. He shook his chin and indignantly. "You," he said, "get up!"

"Look, Pa, darling, I'm going to give you a book to read—about love and romance."

Pa stood and bowed the book on the night table she looked at her face. "I don't need no love and romance," he said. "There's going to be something in the book. Nothing's going to be any more."

"Fifty cents?" He monkey business!" Pa's voice and—fifty cents going to university?"

"All right, Pa, all right," Molly said softly. "Take it easy. The Red the Little Lovers' Press, at going to university. (Chamberlain will work in the store and the Prince will go to college.)"

"I want you to talk to me."

"I'll talk to him. How get out on 2 out door. Mr. Spauld will make her breakfast if you want her getting."

"Thank a going to university!" and Mr. Miller to himself and he turned and obediently moved the door.

Mr. Miller stepped on the door and turned. The light from the
